Don other. Outside, looking from the plaza. Don her, and this is how sha treats me." Here the commandante broke down.

"I have heard some goesin of this," interdoorway and two little grated windows on of ther side this entrance close under the

Once within this doorway, however, a few yard, or patio, a little open square, where grars grew, where fig trees bore their lusfruit, where flowers bloomed and a ittle fountain made rainbows in the sun-

Out upon this patio the doors end winhe cool shadow of a wide gallery. Thus are always the beauties of a Spaniard's house for the pleasure and the comfort of its own, and not for the gaping wonder of the street. Now, back in these far gone years, when it was the season of the early planting, on a earticularly fresh and radiant morning, the great gilt cross atop the Church of San Fernando looked down and saw Don Ramon striding hastily across the green square of his own courtyard. He was a brave figure. pon his head he wore a sombrero, broidered with silver thread and encircled with a eavy black estrich plume. His dark, well-shadows chaoing each other behalf the breeze-shaken branches of an aspen. Now a pleased hope, now a dark anxiety. An April day vexed with sudden clouds and hasty showers. Don Ramon was going to the apartments of his newly wedded wife, but above his eye slipped back and from the dark d interior there came a voice, as a voice of judgment from a cave of night.

water from the well and gosstping; the pikes of a line of soldiers could be seen just be-ond, where the garrison was drawn up valting inspection When the commandante appeared a nock of children ran up to him, expectant of coppers or a ration of sweets, to bid him "Buenes dies, Senor Commandante." but "Buenes dies, Senor Commandante." but when they saw the scowl upon his face away your house; leave early, return late. There has been woulded his way across that are barred to you, our subject that are barred to you, person of the shadows of your own partments, spend much time away from your house; leave early, return late. There has been woulded his way across that are barred to you. When the commandante appeared a flock he plaza he had a fling at the women at the well, bidding them fill their jars at once, go on about their tasks and not to loiter in two lines, musketeers and pikemen, the garrison stood while Don Ramon inspected each soldier. It was a dreadful ordeal. Woe to him with rust upon his piece or powder stain within the barrel; with dented pike; with button gone or belt awry. Nine soldiers of his Catholic majesty could not lie upon their backs because of the bloody network of stripes that burned and festered there The lash had done no such work since that dark day two years before, when there came news of French aggression over toward Lou-isiana. And all these doings of Don Ramon during the morning were watched by a pair of keen, bright eyes from the little grated vindows at the side of the cuter doorway of his own house. There was also pleasure in a certain fair breast at the temper Don Ramon was in and so plainly showing.

When the inspection was finished and he had himself seen his unlucky soldiers tied and properly scourged, Don Ramon's official duties for the time being were over and he had opportunity to attend to his own private affairs; those affairs that had so rumpled his temper and caused such disturbance and pain to his underlings. When kings are exed wee comes upon royal households. So Don Ramon too: bimself and his troubles to the priests. He passed under an arched doorway beneath an image of the Virgin and went down a colonnaded row cells to the farthest end, where dwelt Padre Ignacio, the padre in charge of the mission. The holy man sat within his room, an open book in his lap which he was reading between drowey tapees into dozing, for it was a soothing languorous day that wooed slumber. The forty winks were chased away, however, by the quick, nervous ste of the commandante upon the threshold. "Father," said Don Ramon seating himelf upon a stool and forgetting in his the salutations which were due, "I am it great trouble, and am sorely distressed."

"What is wrong, my son? Have the Inlians risen? Is there news of the French, f La Harpe or St. Denis?" There was anxiety in the padre's voice as he asked this, for he loved peace, all the more because of the wide experience he had and in troublesome times.

'None of these. I wish it were. The trou-Mone of these. I wan it were. The trouble is in my own house, a trouble I cannot meet and fight with the sword and musketoon. It is my wife. Donna Dolores. We have had differences. We have had differences. We have had differences words. We have had unaccomply quarrels.

flextas, gayeties and pleasing distractions. In the old days of San Antonio, long be-fore the reutiess grings had clipped the tedium and monotony beyond endurance; that name to "Santone," when all Texas belonged she has no companionship, no amusements, to Spain, this little domestic insurrection in band, not with her? She insiets that I rethe house of the commandante, Don Do-mingo Ramon, arose, had its few days of Domingo Ramon, officer of his majesty, govliving and was crushed forever. I fear I shall go mad with yexaposed Padre Ignacio before Don Ramon could continue, "but you must compose yourself. Nothing is to be gained by giving way to anger or grief. What a pity! So shortly marsteps would bring the visitor into the court- ried and so unhappy! What would you have me do in the matter, my son?"

"Go to her. Tell her of her duty to me, her husband. Remind her of her broken yows. She swore to ablde by me, to love and obey me. Does not our holy church provide mishment for such infractions, for the sin of her discontent, her obstinacy, her willfulness? Humble her spirit and bring her to some sense of the wickedness of her actions." "It is not well," said the padre, "for even one of us to take part between husband and In fact, I have no fancy to beard the lady on such an errand. The influence of our holy church has its limitations. Then something may also be said on her behalf." "I believe she lived a maid at Queretaro?" "It was there I wooed and won her."

"Queretaro! I too know Queretaro, It is indeed a sweet memory of a most lovely city. I mind me now of the clear blue of the sky above it; its pure mountain air, the gardens, the vineyards, the long streets, shaded by the lister of well-polished buttons. A wide leather belt from shoulder to hip held up his scabbardlers aword of duil blue steel, that shone with the luminous sheen of a peafow's feather; its bross hilt was as fine gold to the eye this day. He wore high hoots of soft leather and as he waiked his long roweled spurs jingled.

The short distance across the courtyard sufficed for changes in expression upon Don Ramon's face, as the fickering sunlight and shadows chaoing each other beneath the breeze-shaken branches of an aspen. But well work will be first of these had reached the zenith of the high heavens Don Ramon came home, whistling again as though to care and ills a stranger.

Then Manuela came, as though a figure "It is no use to try to enter." it said, "my difference? All these will be necessary. Why should he be suddenly so contented and happy? Why should he come forth radiant tollay from the gloem of yesterday? She could not bear to watch his happy progress longer, but returned to her own room and sat down there to think it over. At the very first she recalled Lis leaving the house the night before and his late return; something he had never done before since their marriage. Was there anything in this to account for his present complacent acquiescence in a state of things that had so listly driven him wild? Was he receiving consolation elsewhere? Was there another woman? The poison of the suspicion ran through all her veins and set her blood on fire. It was a solid door of oak and looked forbidding. Lightly he rapped thereon, bending his head to listen; once again, more heavily, and then again, with an exclamation that can have no place in the writing, he thundered upon the impassive wood with the heavy, convoluted hill of his sword. In the morning, when the serving women came to wait upon Donna Dolores, they found her sitting by her window. They noticed her face was very pale and drawn and that her eyes were very bright, that she had sat up all night, for her bed was undis-turbed. Being women, no doubt down in their secret hearts they thought about these things, but, being servants, they held their peace. And down in the folds of the gown pon their lady's bosom was something the did not see. If they had it would have added intensity to their thoughts. She stood a moment, helpless, panting furious, and then she found her tongue. Of all the languages of earth none is a rich in vituperation as that of Spain. No one can so fully put its capacity to test as an angry Spanish woman. There in the broad plaza, before all the people, she poured upon him a flood of vitriolic Her epithets lashed and stung him until his hot anger rose and leaped over the barriers of his control. with rage, as he pulled and jerked her across the plaza, through the crowd, which scattered right and left before them. Over to the jail he hauled her, she all the while never ceasing to scream and vilify him, while San Antonio looked on aghast. The fail was but a cell, with walls four feet thick, lighted but by a single iron-grated window set within the heavy door.

Within were a heavy table, a rude cot of boards and a stool. Into this Don Ramon flung his wife with no gentle hand.
"Stay there," he said, "until that devil's tongue can turn itself to language more seemly to its owner's station."

He called an Indian woman and commanded her to go in and stay, and not allow the prisoner to hurt herself. He then took the key from the astounded jailer, who had been sitting by as in a trance, locked the door and went away.

What a position for the wife! She, a woman of gentle blood, cast into a common jail for thieves and felons, and by her own bushond. How could she ever lift her head again? The

Now, when the days had lengthened, the ripe figs were falling in the mission gardens and the first harvest had been gathered and stored in the granaries, Padre Ignacia received a letter from his commandante. Thus

"I have just completed a most satisfactory tour. Our missions flourish and our pests are well guarded. We rest here at Mata-moras. My wife is of all sweet accord and affection. I desired with her to attend the flestas at Monterey, but she longs to return to San Antonio and the charge of my household there. A most tender and loving wife she is become and great is our felicity. She Joins me in regards to yourself and Angelita Vuavis, lest the maid might still be affrighted of her. The state of Mississippi is at length to have a new capitol.
